A, a, Roman, A a, Italian, both of moſt general uſe in writing the European languages; A a, Engliſh Saxon; Α α, Engliſh black letter, nearly, as all the reſt, reſembling that of the German alphabet; A α, Greek, called alpha, from the Hebrew א aleph, which, as all the letters in the Hebrew tongue are ſignificant, denotes either an ox, or a leader, marks of excellence and priority. The firſt place is deſervedly given to this letter on the account of its ſimplicity, being little more than an opening of the mouth; and its ſound, as a vowel (for it is properly a radical conſonant, as are all the reſt) is determined by the adjunct vowel, if it hath any; if not, it is ſilent, and hath no ſound. From this uſe of the Hebrews, the later Greeks ſeem to have taken their note of an eaſy breathing, which they prefixed to all words beginning with a ſlender ſound, as in ἀνός, ἐν, &c. to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe which begin with an aſpirate; as in ἀνα, ἐνδε. This was done after they had diveſted the eighth letter H of the conſonant power which it held in their ancient alphabet conformable to the Hebrew, to make uſe of its figure in denoting the long power of the vowel E. But the Latins followed them not herein, having formed their language from the ancient Aeolians and Ionians, who had only the Cadmean alphabet of ſixteen letters. But to proceed, the Latin and Engliſh A hath the ſame power and figure as the Greek; but its name, as likewiſe the reſt of the letters, from the ſimple ſound a, bé, cé, &c. In Engliſh we have a threefold ſound of this vowel; ſhort, as in bat, cat, &c. like the Hebrew pathabb; long as in dāte, fāte, &c. mix'd with o, obſcure, as in call, fall, where we hear the ſame ſound as in olive, hollow, ſave that in the former it is long, conformable to the Heb. kametz, but in the latter ſhort, conformable to cateph kametz. It is greatly to be wiſhed that we had more letters expreſſive of vocal ſounds; or marks on thoſe we have, to aſcertain their power in the ſame ſyllable; as in fallow, falling; or in thoſe which are analogous, as in coſt, moſt, &c. The want hereof equally affects our Latin pronunciation; for we pronounce mālus and mālus, pāter and māter, with the ſame ſound, which we can ſcarcely think the Latins did. We are indeed more ſecure in the Greek tongue, becauſe directed by more vowels, and the uſe of accents. But to return, A, before e and u in the ſame ſyllable, make two diphthongs ae, and au, whereof the former in Latin is ſubſtituted both for ai the proper, and a the improper diphthong of the Greeks, as in Ἀνείας Aeneas, σφαῖρα, sphaerae; as, on the contrary, the ancient Latins in their own words, when they had occaſion to divide their ae, changed it into the Greek ai; as in aulai, piſtai, frugiſerai. Some make ai a Latin diphthong, as in aiō, Caius; but i manifeſtly belongs to the latter ſyllable, for the Greeks write not Γαῖος, but Γαῖο; whence it ſeems to be very manifeſt that ai in the Latin tongue is not a diphthong, as in the Greek. As there is a mutual intercourſe between all the vowels with each other, ſo in this a is changed into e; as in laeto, deleto, ago, egi; ſo e into a, as in decem, decanus; aveo, avarus; a into i, as in apiſcor, adipiſcor; ſo i into a, as reipſa, reapſe; a into o, as in ſparta, ſportum, taxus, toxicum; o into a as in ſoveo, ſavilla, volvo, valvae; a into u, as in camera, cumera, taberna, contubernium; u into a, as in glubo, glaber, μυδάω, madeo. In the Roman comitia, or aſſemblies for making laws, the people had two tables; in the one were two letters, V. R. uti rogas, ſignifying their aſſent; becauſe a motion for a new law to be made was called rogatio: in the other this letter A. i. e. antiquo, or antiqua probo, to ſhew their diſſent. In capital cauſes they had alſo two tables covered with wax, in one whereof was this letter A. i. e. absolvo; in the other C. for condemno; whence the former is by Cicero, pro Milone, called ſalutaris, the latter triftis. In numerals it denoted anciently 500, and Ā 5000. Other uſes of this, and the reſt of the letters, in the compendious notes of the ancients, are too many here to be enumerated; I have therefore under this, as well as the following letters, explained thoſe which moſt frequently occur, referring the explanation of the reſt to a more general Collection thereof out of Sertorius Urſatus, and others, which may be of uſe, ſometimes, even to the learned themſelves, in reading ancient inſcriptions found upon Roman monuments and coins. A. Absolvo, abſolutio, aiunt, aliquando, aeger, albo, annus, anni, annos, annis, argentum, Augustus, Augusta, Augustalis; A. A. Auro argento; A. A. A. F. A a, Lat. ab A, a Graec. Nam formas literarum veteres Graecas pene easdem fuisse, quae suo tempore fuerunt Latinae, testatur Plinius 7, 58. Hanc vocalem ut in suavisimam notat Cicero in Orat. 49, quod tamen de crebra ejus repetitione accipiendum; nam in ea saepius iterata asperitatem notavit etiam Martianus Capella. Saepius quidem in alias atque alias vocales mutatur, tam longas, quam correptas, aliquando fortasse, suavioris soni causa; sed cum hoc commune habeat cum reliquis vocabulis, imò & consonis, nihil hinc a primae literae dignitate abscedere videtur.

A, a preposition of the same signification, made from, and for the better found used before consonants instead of.

Ab [ex and, recisa o, & tenui in suam mediam conversa, emergit ab] a prep. governing an ablative case.

It is used always before vowels, and frequently, especially by Caesar and Livy, before all consonants, if v, x, and z, be not excepted.

It has a great variety of significations. (1) From. (2) By, after a verb active, passive, or neuter, denoting the efficient cause. (3) By reason of. (4) After, next. (5) At. (6) In. (7) The term from. (8) For that reason. (9) Out of. (10) From [ever since]. (11) Against. (12) For [as to, in respect to]. (13) After, from the time that, or next to. (14) For, on our side, or party. (15) On. (16) With. (17) In comparison of. (18) As far as from, or hard by. (19) Towards an object. (20) The moving cause, for out of, by reason of. (21) The part affected. (22) A relation to the subject, as to, as for. (1) Senectus abstrahit à rebus gerendis, Cic. de Sen. 5. (2) Laudatur ab his, culpatur ab illis, Hor. Sat. 1, 2, 11. Mars communis saepe spoliantem & exultantem evertit, & perculit ab abjecto, Cic. pro Mil. 21. Caput à sole dolet, Plin. 24, 10. Cum Marcellus perit ab Hannibale, Id. 11, 73.

But the ablative after verbs passive doth not always note the efficient cause, but sometimes the term from whom, or what; as, A me diligentia expectatur, Cic. my diligence is expected, or diligence is expected from [not by] me.

(3) Scipio avidior erat certaminis à spe, quam successus rerum augebat, Liv. (4) Alter ab illo, Virg. Ecl. 5, 49. (5) Omnia ego Ithac auscultavi ab ostio, Plaut. Merc. 2, 4, 9. (6) Stare à mendacio, Id. (7) A labore ad libidinem, Ter. Andr. 1, 1, 50. (8) Id ab re interregnum appellatur, Liv. 1, 17. (9) A Germania reversus, Id. (10) A puero, Cic. (11) Defendo à frigore myrtos, Virg. Ecl. 7, 6. (12) A me pudica est, Plaut. Curc. 1, 1, 51. Sanus ab illis vitiis, Hor. Sat. 1, 4, 29. (13) Dionis classis quadragesimo die à securi navigavit, Plin. 16, 74. from the time it was cut down by the ax. (14) A me stat. A nobis facit. Dico ab reo, Cic. (15) A parte aquilonis, Plin. 13, 48. (16) A potu prandium incipiunt, Id. (17) Ab illo friget, Gall. (18) Flavius supplementum ab Roma abduxerat, Liv. (19) Ab innocentia clementissimus, Cic. pro Rosc. Amer. 30. (20) Ab amore scribo, Balbus ap. Cic. (21) Doleo ab oculis, Plaut. Cist. 1, 1, 62. Ab animo perit, Plin. (22) Inventus à labore, Cic. Offic. 1, 20.

More particular uses.

A or ab is elegantly used before a person to signify his house, or some other adjunct. Ab se egreditur foras, Plaut. Truc. 4, 3, 78. from his own house. Aqua à fabro ferrario post cibum data, Gels. from the smith's forge.

A or ab after the Verbs do, solvo, numero, repraesento, lego, &c. indicates the person by whose hands, as, Dabo tibi a trapezita viaticum, Plaut. Capt. 2, 3, 89. out of the banker's hands. Frater laborat ut tibi ab Egnatio solvat, Cic. Att. 7, 18. by his hands. A me numerabo, repraesentabo, Id. out of my own pocket. A me hoc illi dices, Cic. you shall tell him from me. A matre illius venio, Plaut. Mil. 4, 7, 16. I come on account of her mother, or, in her mother's name.

This preposition is elegantly used as a circumlocution of an adj. or a gen. case; as, A nobis crepuere fores, Ter. i. e. nostrae, our doors. Pastor ab Amphryso, i. e. Amphrysus, Virg. Geor. 3, 2. the Amphrysian shepherd. Illa ab illo [sc. illius] animadvertenda injuria est, Ter. Andr. 1, 1, 129. this undutiful carriage of his.

This observation seems in some measure to explain the ellipsis in these following forms, and many more of the like kind;

Ab actis, a public notary,
A cubiculis, a chamberlain,
A manu, a clerk, or secretary,
A pedibus, a footman,
A rationibus, an accountant,
A studiis, a director of one's studies.

For by adding minister, servus, libertus, or some such word (relations being frequently suppressed) it is minister a manus, servus à cubiculis, &c. which, according to the said observation, being turned into an adjective, or a gen. case, will be minister amanuensis, or manus; servus cubicularius, or cubiculi.

It is sometimes used before words not casual; as, A pridie Idus Septembris, from the twelfth.

It seems sometimes redundant; as, A metu infamiae, Tac. for fear of: Sometimes deficient, Modo pecorum barbaris trahabatur, Id. by the barbarians.

Abs, of, or from. This preposition, as Cicero acquaints us, was rarely used in his time, except in books of accounts, and not all neither. It stands alone before no letters but q and t; as, abs quibus, abs te, Ter. In composition also before c, as abscedo.

A memorial syllable for the use of a or ab in composition.

(4) Abscindens, (1) abigens, (3) abolefcens, (5) abnegat
(2) amens.

A in composition is only used before m and t; Ab before vowels, and d, f, h, j, l, n, r, s. Before g only in abgreco, and p in abpatruus. In aufero, and aufugio, ab is changed into au, Cic. Orat. 47.

B.

B, b. The second letter, but first consonant in the alphabet. It is a labial, shutting the lips, which A had opened. Among the Mutes it hath a middle Place, and Power, between the smooth and easy Sound of P, and the aspirate and rougher Sound of Ph, F, and V, every one of which in the Derivation and Inflection of Words, is frequently, for the better Sound, changed into some of the other; so from βάρκω comes pasco, from ἀπό, ab, from labor, lapsus; from scribo, scripsi; b, always continuing in the Inflection of such Words before a Vowel; but, because it would otherwise be too hard, before a consonant, it is softened into p. So from rubeo, rufus; from θρίαμβος, triumphus; φάλανα, balaena; from βέμω, fremo; from γίβω, gibbus; from ἄν, avus: Yea, in some Latin Words, b and v, are indifferently writ; as sebum and sebum; so also b and p, as Publicola and Poplicola; b and f, as, bubalus and bufalus. B, is sometimes inserted in the Middle of Words for the better Sound, as in ambages, ambio, amburo, &c. B, is servile in the inflection of the Dative and Ablative Plural of the Third, Fourth, and Fifth Declensions of Latin Nouns; as likewise of the Preterimperfect Tense, and also the Future, in the First and Second Conjugations. B. In antient writings denotes Balbus, or Brutus; B. F. in the preface to Laws or Contracts, Bonum factum; B. AV. Bonis avibus, or Bonis auspiciis.

C.

C, c. The third letter, but second consonant, may indeed be copied immediately from the Hebrew ק , being exactly the same, only in complaisance to our way of writing, turning towards the right; yet is much more probably framed from the Greek Γ , its right and perpendicular line, for the more ease and quick dispatch in writing, instead of an angle, degenerating into a semicircle. For it is evident, that the Latin letters are many of them exactly the same with the Greek; and most of the rest, which are common to both tongues, differ no more, than haste, conveniency of writing, or perhaps, some novel, and growing depravation might probably occasion. And I may add also, That many words, natives of Greece, were made denizens of Rome, without any formality of changing their garb, especially those of Doric families: others again, in pretty near proportion between their number of words and letters, suffer some change, to be more civilly treated there: besides, it is notorious that the Roman youth were anciently taught both to read, and write their own language by Greek masters. This I judge proper to observe here once for all, and proceed. The rank which C holds in the Latin alphabet, answering that of Γ in the Greek, is a farther evidence of this extraction: besides, when the Greeks in their own letters express a pure Latin word, where this letter is found, they commonly substitute Γ , or Κ , for Cajus Caesar, writing $\Gamma\alpha\iota\omicron\varsigma\text{Κ}\alpha\iota\sigma\alpha\rho$. Yea, in many Latin words c and g are indifferently writ; as Cajus Cnaeus, or Gajus Gnaeus. But before I go farther, I must do a piece of justice to this letter, by declaring, that, though it acknowledges the Greek Γ its parent, yet it may challenge the same regard from the Latin letters g and k, and, in the opinion of some learned men, from q also: the first whereof was not known to the Romans, till after the first Punic war. This is plainly proved from the royal laws, where Acrom is writ for Agnum, Acrom for Agrum; and that famous remaining piece of Antiquity, the monumental pillar of Duilius, where we read Lecio pugnando, exfociont, &c. for Legio pugnando, effugiunt. As for K, it appears never to have been much used, and is now so obsolete, that it is not writ in more than two or three Latin words, where c is always indifferently, or perhaps better, used. And for Q, the indifferency found in writing very many Latin words therewith, or with C, as cur, or quur; quum, or cum; locutus, or loquutus; cottidie, or quotidie, hath induced many Critics to deduce its original from c. But this shall be considered in its proper place. The name of C, if we attend to analogy, is always Kè, as is its found before all vowels; never Sè. And here, with much reluctance, I remark, That foreigners, who own we understand Latin perfectly, and write it correctly, account us little better than barbarians, in several parts of pronunciation; but in none more justly, than our depraved sound of this letter before ae, oe, e, i, and y, as if it were S; which at the same time our learned men confess to differ from the ancient usage of Greece, and Rome, to be unreasonable in itself, and to introduce a strange confusion in words and things; so that caedo, and sedo, coepi, and sepi; census, and sensus; cicer, and sifer; cygni, and signi, and many thousands more, have, with us, one and the same sound. Hence also it comes to pass, that its found is intirely lost after S; so that coena, and scena; celeris, and sceleris, and innumerable words of the same kind, are confounded. This I humbly leave to the consideration and redress of the learned school-masters of this kingdom, as very well deserving it, and return to its true sound; which is the same with that usurped by the exploded K, and stands related to the harder sound of g, as p to b; and therefore in the inflection of words g before a vowel, is changed into c before a consonant; as ago, actum, not agtum; lego, lectum, not legtum; just as scribo, scriptum. Neither ought it to be founded with an aspirate, as the modern Italians do, who say chicbindela, Chicbero, &c. for cicindela, Cicero. Concerning its intercourse with f, and t, the tenuis of the third Class of Mutes, I rather choose to treat in the dissertation upon those letters, lest I be too tedious in this.

* Comoedia, ae. f. [à κόμμη, vicus, & πῶς, cantus, quod ini- tio fid vicis juvenes cantare soliti essent, antequam in urbem convenissent, Fest.] A comedy, or interlude. See the commendation, use, and end of it in Donatus's preface to Terence; its definition in Scal. Poët. 1, 5. It is either old or new. The old, whereof were masters Eupolis, Cratinus, and Aristophanes, is described by Quint. 10, 1. and the excess of liberty, its greatest fault, by Cic. 4: De Repub. The new differed from the old almost in every thing. In matter, manner, time, furniture, style, and verse. Their matter was almost as copious as that of Satire; every action and person, even the greatest commanders and princes not being excepted, and herein more blame-worthy, because it reflected on the good as well as bad. See Cicero in the place quoted. The new fetched its arguments from common life, as also its persons, who were generally young gentlemen in love, and their servants tricking their old masters to gratify their young ones. The old flourished about the time of the Peloponnesian war; the new when Greece had lost its liberty. The furniture of the old very large; of the new, very small, the Chorus being entirely taken away. The style of the old was epic or satirical; of the new, mean or low. The old admitted all kinds of verse; the new only iambic. The necessary parts of both are four, Prologus, Epitasis, Catastasis, Catastrophe; which see in their places.

D.

D, The fourth Roman Letter, is almost of the same figure with that in the famous Βερενικῆ inscription, brought into Britain by William Sherrard Doctor of laws, and famous in many parts of curious learning: who, being Consul at Smyrna, ordered it with the utmost care and diligence to be copied from an huge stone lying still at Sigeum, where the literature used 2300 years ago, which was before the use of the long vowels, and double consonants had obtained, shews itself not only to the wonder and admiration of the curious, but also to the great benefit and advantage of students, and critics in the Greek tongue; especially as illustrated by the reverend and learned Divine and Antiquary Mr. Chishull. In this monument the angles which are unequal, come nearer the form of the Roman than the modern Δ, whose angles are equal, and therefore more easily slipping into the form of the Italian D, by leaving the left angle as it was, and circumflecting the two others for the greater haste in writing; which was done soon after, as we plainly see in the noble inscription of Herodes Atticus, that learned Critic and Antiquary, graven on his pillars exactly both in letters and spelling after the pattern of remote ages: vid. Gruter. Inscript. p. 27. Nor is it a wonder that the Latin letters are the same with the Greek, since Latium itself was called antiently Græcia major. Thus much I thought fit to premise with respect to the form of the letter. As to its name, this, as all the other letters, the Romans seem to have called by the Greek names, Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, &c. So Juvenal, Hoc discunt omnes, ante Alpha & Beta, puellæ, Sat. 14, 209.

So Cicero calls his Country seat at Formiæ, Digamma, because it begins with the Æolian F.

As for the power of this letter, it hath a middle sound between t and th; and therefore hath its place in the middle of the last Rank of the Mutes, and is a t hardned, as t is a d softned; which, as those of the other ranks, are frequently changed into each other, as from μῦθος, mutus; from ἀκιδῶ, the gen. of ἀκίς, sagitta; from ἀδῶ, ador; πέρω, perdo; γαθῶ, gaudeo. Neither doth our English tongue refuse this change, as at from ad, what from quid, two from duo, so three, thrust, from tres, trudo; water from ἵδωρ. It also admits a substitute out of the second rank of its sisters, to soften its sound, as quicquid, quicquam, quicque, for quidquid, &c. Neither doth this letter refuse an intercourse with three liquids, l, n, r. To omit Greek words, wherein their mutual offices are most obvious, as less instructive to the younger sort, for whose service these notes upon literature, in the proper sense of the word, are principally designed; the antients said dingua, sedda, for lingua, sella; cadamitas for calamitas; dispennerere for dispendere; arventus for adventus; and this letter still keeps its post in arbiter and arcesso. It also corresponds with the solitary s, as ῥόδον, rosa. It admits before it in the same or diverse syllables, of the mutes, b; as βδέω, pedo, bdellium, ab dico; and g, as ῥυδος, smaragdus: of the liquids, l, n, r, in diverse syllables; as, caldæ, candor, cardo; and in the Latin tertius, and English Third, you have all the three of the last rank exemplified. In the preposition ad, almost before any consonant, d may keep its place, or be changed into the consonant of the beginning word, except b, v, and j; as, adcurro, or accurro, &c. but the change is more usual in many words, to make the pronunciation softer, or quicker; for we seldom write adcommodo, adcufo, &c. indeed herein use is the best rule. This letter also was antiently used to prevent the collision of two vowels in different words, as Censes med esse? for me esse, Plaut. which use it still retains in the same word; as, prodes, proderam, prodire, for proes, proeram, proire. Yea in the most antient times, it was added to the preceding word even before consonants, as it should seem to make the sound more masculine, as in the Duilian or Bilian pillar, In altod marid pugnandod for In alto mari pugnando. Lastly, in numerals D stands for 500; being not a letter, but rather used for a numeral mark, as the Greeks use ς for 6, and λ for 90: for the numeral Note of 1000, being CIO from the old ω, the half thereof is IO; which, for quicker writing drawn close together, makes D:
